The microwave radiation exerts a radical effect on water, especially aqueous solutions. As a result of the radiation, the molecules of water contained in the solution lose their translational symmetry. For a given volume element of solution, the molecular density of this element decreases due to the microwave treatment, which affects the water potential. The observed decrease of the molecular density causes a decrease of the absolute value of the potential of the element relative to that of the bulk solution. This phenomenon has been confirmed by a small-angle neutron scattering (SANS) investigation. The atomic exchange of the neutron beam is used as a probe, hence the SANS investigations only detect this effect in the solution in a small time interval after the radiation. The slowing down of the atomic movement causes an increase of the life-time of these moments, leading to a relative increase of the duration of this effect. The effect increases the rate of the molecular exchange between the volume elements. The radiation-induced processes also affect the life-time of the potentials of the element and of the bulk solution. While the life-times of the potential of the volume element and of the bulk solution increase with the energy flux, the life-time of the potential of the element decreases with the energy flux.* Promotional value expires on 12/19/18. Amount paid will be refunded via check on 12/29/18. Free Shipping only applies to orders placed before 11/22/18. Only one free DVD per household,
