Milk and Water I've been playing through the new Far Cry game for the first time recently and having had a great time. Then I turned on the XBox 360 Kinect while playing and the screen went completely white. I've since read and read online about this issue and nothing seems to be a solution yet. I've installed the latest driver and system patch, but not a solution yet. It's not a problem I'll have to live with forever as I have a Xbox one controller that I'll eventually install. The issue is that it's a bit of a shame that the game didn't work with the Kinect, or that it's a brand new system and will have such a limited lifespan. I know this isn't the best gaming forum but I'm wondering if anyone has any experience with this issue, and what they did to solve it?

Q: Django render template from static files I am a bit confused on how to approach this problem. I am building a website that has part of it static and part of it not. I want to separate the static part into a folder that will be served from the root of the website. I have an HTML template that I want to be rendered from a static file that is in the static folder. The problem is that I don't want to have to edit the templates. I want to render the template from a static file with a different name every time it's requested. I am using the built-in template language and the template language is being called by the default settings of the django server. A: You need to modify settings.py and add to `MIDDLEWARE_CLASSES`. But before modifying any settings files, check if you are using `DEBUG` mode and you should be using `DEBUG=True`. I don't think you have to do anything else.
